Judge Storer and Street Railways. Whether or not we are to have any more lines of street railway in the city, appears to depend upon the question whether Judge Storer will permit them to be built. So far, that gentleman has seemed to consider it his business to give force to the wishes of such as are opposed to their construction. One body of our fellow-citizens are disinclined to have a line of railway traverse the street where they reside. Judge Storer decides that it shall not so traverse. Another body favors a single, but objects to a double track, past their residences. Let the track be single, decrees Judge Storer. It is true that he discovers reasons for his several conclusions; but, unhappily, perhaps, those which he urges in one case, are incompatible with these which are declared to govern in another. The better way for his reputation would be to pronounce his decrees at once. without attempting to place them in the light of logical conclusions-in which case he would escape that criticism whose slighest effort is sufficient to show, not only the untenability of his positions, but the inconsistency of the arguments which he employs for their support. Of a court so respectable as the Superior Court of Cincinnati, is holden to be; so learned in the law, and so able in all questions where limits and precedents are fully established, or of any of its members, it Storer is a well-disposed gentleman; deeplytain circumstances, the judicial reason- evidence of this. ing of Judge Storer is as uncertain as his deportment upon the bench is undignified. Confined to nisi prius and unknown parties, he would, doubtless, serve the public with faithfulness and to general acceptance; conscientious in its exercise.

for an injunction to restrain the Pendleton | incidence. and Fifth-street Market-space Railway Company from laying a double track on Broadway, as reported in the papers of the city, we are able to gain farther information as to rules under which Judge Storer's discretion is to be exercised in respect to future lines of railway. In the case of Robert Hosea and others vs. The Ohio and Mississippi Railroad supervision of the mode in which the street was in all future time to be used, remaining to the original dedicator, and passing to all who are in privity with him.

This ultimate, or in other words, this paramount and perpetual right, was so construed as to place in the hands of the holders of the aising an objection, to which it was the business of the Court to give legal effect. In the decision of Tuesday, we learn how narrowly the city has escaped being deprived of continued:

"If this were an open question, if these passenger railroad companies had not been permitted to occupy the streets, and had not expended large sums of money in equipping

Charleston, An intestig their lines, he would have very little hesita-

That is to say, nothing but the fact that the roads are built, prevents Judge Storer from issuing his mandate and keeping them out entirely. If the question was shall they be built?-he, as a Court of Equity, would deem it his duty to decree in the negative.

The people of Cincinnati have, therefore, in the first place, to thank Heaven that Judge Storer did not awake to a sense of his official powers and obligations until-so far as two orthree important lines are concerned-it was too late; and in the second place to wonder why he does not interpose his authority and prohibit the further progress of those lines whose expenditures are as yet comparatively triffing.

In attempting to get out of the difficulty into which he fell when he invented the "ultimate right of supervision," for the benefit of Robert Hosea and others, Judge Storer has been driven to further inventions. He now finds that this ultimate, paramount, and perpetual right-this right which remains to the original dedicator, and passes to all who are in privity with him-is defeasible by the act of a third party gaining an adverse possession. In the case of Hosea it was holden that a railway was a perversion of the street to purposes foreign to the original intent, and, therefore, its construction was prohibited; in the case of the Broadway parties, it is laid down that a perversion, through an expenditure of money by the party perverting, becomes a vested right, with which to interfere is not an "open question." How much longer this judicial harlequinade is to continue, or how much further it is to be carried, is, perhaps, also an open question; but if there is any reason, any learning, or any sense of duty in the aggregate Court, it is not out of place to express the hope that on the "final hearing," it will be made to appear.

It was thought by some, and that not without the appearance of reason, that in respect to city railways-things of whose great publie convenience there can be but one opinion-the matter was in the worst possible hands when it was in those of the City Council. Nor can it be denied that our municipal legislature appears to have exhausted its ingenuity in devices to reduce the amount of benefit to be realized thereby as low as

But in the light of recent judicial exploits in the same field, there is ground to look with some respect upon legislative achievements. The latter were undoubtedly bad enough; but, although ill-judged, there were attempts perceptible to arrive at a conception of the public interest, and even to promote it; while in the former there is a chimpanzee-like unconsciousness of every thing but his own whims, prejudices, and dilemmas, in the conduct of the judicial officer, which, if it were not sorrowful, would be amusing.

No New Issues. At this time, when the very foundations of the great Democratic party are threatened, and when the fate of the Republic-inseparbly connected with that party-is trembling in the balance, it is sad to see the reckless disposition of a portion of the Southern Democracy to trifle with the dangers that threaten

What must be the blind desperation of faction that at this time will undertake to destroy that time-honored usage of the Democratic party-a platform liable to two constructions, to which, under Providence, it owes its great success in the nation.
